The Consolation of the People: Governing Caste Violence in Postcolonial South India, c. 1970s.

Anti-Dalit violence is ubiquitous in post-colonial India, but though it is well-documented by human rights organizations, South Asianist academics have largely failed to recognize the phenomenon as a subject fit for research. This paper makes a preliminary foray into this underpopulated field, taking as its example one instance of violence that occurred in northern Tamil Nadu in 1978, and its afterlives. It breaks with the conventional wisdom on anti-Dalit violence, which conceptualizes it as the work of a retrograde “society” that the Indian state is unable fully to control. Instead, the paper analyzes the specific procedures used by government administrators to delimit the political consequences of such events, revealing their attempts to reconcile Dalit subordination with the conception of an undivided Tamil people that functions as an article of faith in postcolonial Tamil politics.

Connecting Migration Brokerage with Criminal Politics: A Dalit Fabric of Labour Circulation in South India

Why and how do Dalit labour migrant brokers engage with Dalit henchmen of bosses, small-time criminals and violent politicians? This presentation argues for migration brokerage to be examined along a broad continuum of brokerage, notably politics, to explore the local fabric of labour circulation in the Indian construction sector, and the ways caste and class relations are mobilised and mediated in South India.

Nationalism of Exclusion: Gaumata and her unholy sons

The right wing forces in India have relentlessly tried to push forward an agenda of religious fundamentalism in upholding a Brahminical patriarchal order. One of the important tools for this project is the cow or the gaumata (mother cow). This article explores the discourse around construction of cow as a symbol and how this has been used to propagate a particular type of legitimate nationalist symbol located at the intersection of caste, gender and religion.
